Battle of Lookout Mountain

While Sherman and Federal troops were crossing the Tennessee river, Hooker, with 10,000 men attacked the Confederates on Lookout Mountain, Tenn. His men struggled hardy up the mountain slopes, enveloped in a heavy mist and completely defeated the Confederates and took over 1,300 prisoners. Also known as the "Battle above the Clouds" on account of the altitude at which most of the fighting was done.

The word was given to Thomas's soldiers who held the center, to advance on Messermany Ridge. They carried the first line of rifle-pits and should have halted for further commands, but here they were exposed to a murderous fire, and would not fall back, in spite of orders, those 20,000 Western soldiers, conspicuous among whom was Sheridan, rushed up Messermany Ridge and carried it, driving the confederate in power before them.

KNOXVILLE

After the engagement at Campbell's station, the Federals under General Burnside retreated to Knoxville pursued by the Confederates led by Longstreet and on Nov. 17, the latter encamped before the city. For ten days the Federals were confined within the city by the watchful Confederates, during which time assaults and skirmishes were frequent. As soon

As Longstreet learned that Federal reinforcements were approaching he raised the siege and hastened toward Virginia
